Q: How to analyze the future financial performance of early stage companies? Suppose one wants to analyze the financials of a young company. Is the past performance of the company good a proxy for its future performance? If yes, in what way? A: If the company has been past profitable, that is, it has been making a profit for a while, it is very likely that it will continue making a profit. The important things to note here are: 1. Make sure you look back at the cash-flow, not just the balance-sheet. 2. At a minimum, look at the long-term trend - the fact that it has been making a profit for a while does not by itself guarantee future profit (it may just be that the company has had a rough ride and is now settling into a more profitable period). 3. Ideally you will also consider some sort of forecast - for instance, if you see a company that has never been profitable and has only turned profitable in recent years, it might be a mistake to take the most recent year's profit as an indication of future profitability. My personal guess would be that, in practice, the past performance of a company is always a reasonable predictor of future performance, if only because it is hard to predict the future. Some companies have a bad track record for whatever reason, and are taken to bankruptcy. Some companies have a good track record and are promoted to IPO. If a company is a new entrant or a very small company, it is likely to have a short history, and thus a short track record. Once it has a reasonable track record, then that record is probably a good indication of its future performance. Edit: Re. the "first year" of a startup, it is possible that it has not yet made a profit in year 1. Or it could be a fairly typical startup (also relatively new), making a profit in year 1. It really doesn't make a difference. MBBS in Nepal | Therapies Nepal MBBS in Nepal: Nepal has been long famous for its traditional medical practices. This country is 3da54e8ca3
