This is the last day of the 2016 Democratic National Convention. Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders continues to poll strongly in the Democratic race, buoyed by his large and enthusiastic rallies. (Photo by Mario Tama/Getty Images) Most Popular Bernie Sanders' political rise came via millions of voters in a historic election he won, claiming nearly as much support as Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton combined. But he lost the presidential nomination and has a long way to go if he wants to make history again. That shouldn't be a given, because Sanders' campaign -- and that of his backers -- has all kinds of new tricks that could change the convention math once again. Just in case they don't, Democratic party chair Tom Perez rolled out a new strategy on Saturday that will involve turning many delegates and elected officials at the upcoming convention into superdelegates. The idea is to change the party -- and the perception of it -- so that you have to be a "super delegate" to have any real influence in the process. The main idea behind the new superdelegate system is to keep the supermajority of elected officials out of the process, giving them the chance to support candidates they like. But some people are already up in arms about the new plan and they have plenty of motivation to make sure it's never put into effect. Sanders still has a substantial lead in the popular vote and he's unwilling to budge on some of the primary fights he's already had, setting up potential party chaos. Even if his backers don't get much of the way, there's a chance they can create chaos in the convention. If Sanders gives away his delegates -- or even stands for re-nomination -- it's likely to set up a convention with plenty of elected officials who don't want to take his delegates. That could lead to a lot of yelling and fistfights among factions -- and the Sanders movement is already set up for that. Sanders is playing to his base: He's just going to run for another term

Enzyme-mediated transfer of the guanine nucleobase from GMP to tRNAAsp is essential for aminoacylation of tRNAAsp in the ribosome-dependent translation process. Escherichia coli aspartyl-tRNA synthetase (aspR) contains conserved sequence motifs related to those of class I aminoacyl-tRNA synthetases. One of the aspR structural features is an extensive network of conserved aspartate residues. These aspartates provide the catalytic residues for the aminoacylation of tRNAAsp. Here we report that aspR carrying a D305N mutation (D305N-aspR) exhibits no activity in a reaction with GMP and tRNAAsp and causes a decrease of the apparent KM for aspartate and tRNAAsp of 2- to 3-fold. The aspR D305N mutation thus changes the protein sufficiently to generate an enzyme that has lost the ability to provide the adenylyl group to tRNAAas
